OPERATIONS

To the majority of personnel in the Air Force, a policeman seems to lead quite an easy life—confined mainly to routine prisoner supervising details, tours in town patrol and barrier guard duty, and an occasion honor or color guard formation.

This misapprehension is readily understandable inasmuch that while the rest of the base is inactive—on holiday weekends and at night—the air policeman works hardest. He is therefore rarely seen in the performance of his vital and exacting duties.

During such off-duty periods, the internal security of the base and its millions of dollars worth of Air Force property becomes the sole responsibility of the Air Police Squadron and the eternal vigilance of its various guards and sentries in their watch for theft, sabotage and other subversive and illegal acts.

The position of Wing Provost Marshal is filled by the Squadron Commander. He advises the Wing Commander on the overall state of discipline, standards of conduct and security and on possible future trouble areas and trends which might seriously affect base personnel.
